Title: Music of Games

Sub-Title: Earworms cause Imagination

Home Earworm Inspiration Studious

An Earworm is A melody or a portion of a piece of music that is involuntarily repeated in one's mind, A tune that is stuck in one's head, especially as unwanted or repetitive. So why am I explaining it here? So why this tab? I want to prove that Video Game Music is as powerful as art and other music by playing small samples, whether you could recognize the game or not.

All I want you to do is listen to each song before reading about it; that way you can see how you could relate to others through music. Go ahead and listen to some tunes.

Got some stuff I forgot; the tab on the right/left will provide details on how you can submit some stuff I've forgotten.

Song 1: https://youtu.be/iy3qq7zc4EY?si=4FfC7EBgXEJDsmyk

Earworm Reason: From CBR's website, "Ground Theme" wasn't just the music heard in Super Mario Bros.' first level or the Mario franchise's theme song; it was arguably the theme song for video games as a whole. Besides sounding like a childlike wonder and being repetitive, Ground Theme was so iconic that it was used or referenced by almost everything related to gaming, whether it was connected to the '80s classic Super Mario Bros. or not.

Song 2: https://youtu.be/G-i8HYi1QH0?si=lpB5IMaecd4sJ-9J

Earworm Reason: When Sonic was introduced to this song, Green Hill Zone became one of the biggest earworms in gaming history, so it somehow made it the Unoffical/Offical theme for Sonic as a whole. It was always remixed when the classic Sonic level was homaged, or remixed for jokes, memes, or stories you may've heard, wink wink.