Title: Music of Games

Sub-Title: Inspiration from artists

Home Earworm Inspiration Studious

This section exists because, besides video game developers/musicans, music artists tend to have inspiration to make some of their songs thanks to some Video Games that exist (Or Video Games borrowing the Music because it fits the setting), causing it to be well known in some communities or allowing future creators to take inspiration and use it for creativity

Take a look at these examples, and while you listen, learn the history behind how and why they created the song, borrowed the song, or why use the samples to remix it. And if there are artists/musicans I forgot, please use the tab on the side to leave a message, and I'll add it.

Why?: In Fallout: New Vegas, players could liven up their journeys across the Mojave Wasteland by tuning into the Pip-Boy's radio. One such song was the country ballad "Big Iron," which has since become one of the biggest earworms in gaming history.

Song 2: https://youtu.be/4Gj6V59abDA?si=80w6XeHtR-8hUqOx

Why?: Frontman M. Shadows from an interview, "The song is about the game. There's a full backstory to what [the makers of Call of Duty] have been doing for years with their 'Zombies' series. I'm a big fan of the game, I play it all the time, so I got caught up in the story. They sent me over the full storyline, so I made sure it was going along the lines of the zombie story. So that's what it's about." The song was made in four days for the song to make a debut exclusively in Call of Duty: Zombies (Black Ops 1) that Treyarch commissioned. It became memorable to the Zombies Community when it was found.
